

CPYRIGHT New Chapter, Old Mystery

One of the great mystery stories of modern times opened on March 12, 1956, when Jesus de Galindez, Spanish-Basque, disappeared from the office of Generalissimo Rafael Trujillo, dictator of the Dominican Republic, in New York City. Galindez's friends charged that Trujillo's agents had murdered him, but nothing was ever proved.

On Dec. 3, 1956, Gerald Murphy, an American pilot who reportedly said he knew how Galindez had vanished, disappeared himself in the Dominican Republic. Dominicans said he had been murdered by another flier who had thrown his body into shark-infested seas, but the United States was skeptical.

Last winter a Federal grand jury began to investigate. They called as one witness lawyer John Joseph Frank (right), a former FBI and CIA man. As a result of his testimony he was indicted for working for Trujillo in the U.S. without registering as a foreign agent. Two weeks ago he was convicted, and last week sentenced to eight months to two years in jail. Testimony at Frank's trial partially substantiated Murphy's story that he had flown the drugged Galindez to the Dominican Republic, and opened a new chapter in the mystery.
